

BIRD SIGHTINGS

MAY/JUNE 1999

SUMMARY

By Seth Kellogg, Marjorie W. Rines, Simon A. Perkins, and Robert H. Stymeist

May 1999 was dry with normal temperatures, averaging 58.2° in Boston. It was a good month weatherwise for birders, with comfortable temperatures and very little wind. In Boston, the high for the month was 87° on May 31, which was the first 80° reading of the year, well later than the average date of May 6. Coastal sea breezes kept the temperature down along the coast and warmest temperatures were mainly recorded inland. Rainfall totaled 2.70 inches, with measurable amounts falling on just nine days. There were increased grass and forest fire alerts, since May was the third dry month in a row. There was little wind recorded; in fact, this was the month with the lowest average wind recorded for Boston since 1973. During the first nine days of the month, the light winds were unfortunately from the east or northeast, with fog recorded on May 3-9. Those favorable winds for birders, southwest, were noted on May 14, 25, 26, and 30. Other days with a southerly flow were noted on May 16, 17, 23, 24, 28, and 31.

June was a wonderful month for those seeking tans, with over 62 percent of possible sunshine recorded. June, however, was also very hot and extremely dry. The temperature averaged 71° in Boston, 3.3° above normal, and this was the seventh hottest June in 129 years of record. The high reached 97° on June 7, and many communities west of Boston exceeded 100°. Temperatures over 80° were recorded on more than 16 days in the month in Boston. Rainfall was just a trace, a new record low for June and equaling March 1915 as the two driest months in 129 years of records.

LOONS THROUGH WOODPECKERS

One hundred and eighty Red-throated Loons were still lingering off Tuckernuck in mid-May, and a late Pacific Loon was identified off Cape Ann. A pair of Pied-billed Grebes, present in Westminster for the entire month of May, may have nested locally, an event that is becoming increasingly rare in Massachusetts. A Western Grebe was photographed off Magnolia in mid-May. Most state records of this rare visitor occur in winter.

Cory's Shearwaters typically arrive in the warmer waters south of the Cape and Islands in late June and early July following the completion of their breeding season in the eastern Atlantic. One hundred Cory's arrived on schedule south of Martha's Vineyard, where roughly 50 Leach's Storm-Petrels were also seen. The petrels were over 100 miles from the nearest known nesting colony at Penikese Island in the Elizabeth Islands (moreover, this colony contains only a few pairs, not nearly enough to account for this total), and roughly 200 miles from the nearest nesting Islands in the Gulf of Maine where hundreds breed. While petrels often forage far from their colonies, the birds off Martha's Vineyard might have been pre-breeding sub-adults instead of foraging breeders. Stellwagen Bank was off to a good start on the seabird season by mid June.

Two reports of Least Bitterns might have pertained to locally nesting birds, though no direct evidence of breeding was found at either site. The distributions and abundances of the various species of Ciconiiformes that nest at Kettle Island in Manchester have not changed substantially since last year's (1998) nesting season. This year Snowy Egrets, the most abundant and widespread species, numbered 185 pairs; Great Egrets and Glossy Ibises, the two next most abundant species, numbered 90 pairs and 93 pairs respectively; Little Blue Herons numbered 17 pairs, and Black-crowned Night-Herons, 14 pairs. The most noticeable change was in the number of Great Egrets, which increased from an all-time high total of 80 pairs last year to another all-time high of 93 pairs this year. This species and Glossy Ibis have been the only two species within this particular colony that have shown a steady increase in their numbers since annual monitoring began eight years ago, although, this year, the count of Glossy Ibises showed signs that the numbers of this species might be leveling off. Since the early to mid-1970s, when Cattle Egrets reached their peak abundance as a breeding species in Massachusetts (ten pairs), their numbers have declined. Now, roughly 2-3 pairs presumably still nest each year on Eagle Island in Salem, though no one has reported on this last remaining state breeding site for roughly five years. The larger numbers of Cattles that occur in spring in towns such as Essex and Ipswich may reflect spring overshoots (which eventually retreat to more southerly colonies), or birds that are passing through on their way to nest in south coastal Maine at the northeastern-most limit of the species' breeding range.

As uncommon as Yellow-crowned Night-Herons are in the state, they are even rarer inland, so single Yellow-crowns in Wayland and Worcester were particularly noteworthy. The Worcester bird was especially intriguing since it was an adult, and it was present during the peak of the nesting season. Yellow-crowns, unlike Black-crowns, occasionally nest inland and are not colonial. They will nest almost anywhere, but their solitary habits make their breeding sites very difficult to find.

The only place in the state where Glossy Ibises routinely occur inland is in southeastern towns such as the Bridgewater, Middleboro, and Taunton. Presumably, this is because some northbound migrants follow Narragansett Bay and the rivers that flow into it (such as the Taunton River), and proceed through these towns. A less likely explanation may be that these are individuals foraging from the nearest known colony, at Gould Island in Tiverton, Rhode Island. Four Glossy Ibises at the Great Meadows Refuge in Concord were, no doubt, attracted by the mud flats that were exposed there as a result of the spring drought. A record-high total of eight Black Vultures tallied from various parts of the state (including three in Sheffield alone) was the latest indication of this species' gradual spread northward.

A small Canada Goose, identified as belonging to the Canadian arctic race, hutchinsii, was noted at Plum Island, and a higher-than-average number of Mute Swans found in western Massachusetts included seven in Springfield. Further increases in the numbers of swans inland could represent a potentially bothersome development given this species' tendency for disrupting the ecology of small water bodies and excluding native species of waterfowl, a problem that already prevails in many coastal areas in southeastern New England. The continued presence and slow increase in the numbers of feral Whooper Swans in Essex County has raised similar concerns.

A Greater Scaup in Marshfield and an Oldsquaw in Gloucester remained late into the spring, as did two Common Goldeneye on the Connecticut River and a Ruddy Duck in Melrose. Thousands of White-winged Scoters were observed in mid-May departing on migration to the north from a traditional staging area at Nantucket.

Ospreys are currently known to nest at only two inland localities (in Pepperell and Westboro). But wandering birds seen inland during the breeding season each year heighten our expectation that additional nesting will eventually occur elsewhere in the interior, especially in places such as Quabbin Reservoir and along the Connecticut River.

Sightings of both Swallow-tailed and Mississippi kites at a Truro hawkwatch on successive days in June included two Mississippi Kites on one of the days, and another Swallow-tailed was seen in Marshfield around the same time. Other noteworthy raptor reports included eight migrating Bald Eagles at Plum Island May 10; a minimum of five (and possibly more than twice this number) immature Bald Eagles in Truro in early June; at Plum Island, relatively high counts in the second week of May of Northern Harrier, Sharp-shinned Hawk, and Merlin; the first confirmed nesting of Cooper's Hawk at Nantucket; and notable concentrations of Broad-winged Hawks on two dates in May in Truro. These latter records were examples of a phenomenon that occurs among several species of raptors (mostly late-migrating, non-breeding sub-adults) each spring as a result of the birds being deflected by southwest winds, and being funneled onto the narrowest portion of the outer Cape.

The two reports of King Rail both came from sites where the species has appeared in previous years, and one of the records, in West Bridgewater, involved an apparently mated pair. Also reported from West Bridgewater were high counts of both Virginia Rail and Sora.

An American Golden-Plover in breeding plumage, found in Chatham, furnished an uncommon (but annual) spring record, and one or two American Oystercatchers seen at two different sites on Cape Ann re-ignited suspicions that this species has, or will soon, establish a breeding position on the North Shore. Southbound Lesser Yellowlegs, Least Sandpipers, and Short-billed Dowitchers all returned from Canada on schedule at the end of June, while fifty-six Willets at Nantucket in mid-May were probably mostly (if not all) northbound migrants. Upland Sandpipers in Massachusetts currently nest only at airfields. Censuses of Uplands conducted by the Massachusetts Audubon Society at Hanscom AFB (Bedford, Lexington, Lincoln, and Concord), the former Fort Devens in Lancaster, and Westover AFB in Chicopee, produced a total of roughly 175 individuals, the great majority being at Westover. The only other airfields in the state that are known to support breeding Uplands, but which were not surveyed, include Logan International Airport and Otis AFB (Sandwich, Bourne, Mashpee, Falmouth). A Western Sandpiper, a very rare spring migrant in the state, was reported from Martha's Vineyard, and a breeding-plumage Red-necked Stint at Plum Island in late June represented the second state record for this vagrant in less than a year. Single Ruffs were seen in Newburyport and East Boston, both for only one day.

In this century, Common Snipe have rarely been confirmed nesting in the state. Most of those that breed farther north migrate through the state in April, so any snipe that remain into mid-May raises suspicion of breeding, especially in western Massachusetts, whence most of the nesting records have come. Two Red-necked Phalaropes that made separate appearances at Great Meadows NWR in Concord in the third week of May furnished rare inland records for this oceanic sandpiper.

Little, Black-headed, and Lesser Black-backed gulls were all found in typical numbers. Among the six reports of Caspian Terns, the most noteworthy, because it was inland, came from Wachusett Reservoir, and several Royal Terns wandered north into state waters a bit early. Each year, upon returning from their wintering grounds, hundreds of Roseate Terns usually spend one or two weeks around Nantucket, refueling and recharging their batteries, before they settle into colonies in Buzzards Bay. Eighty Roseates, seen in mid-May at Muskeget Island, just northwest of Nantucket, were assumed at the time to be doing the same; however, they remained to breed — a significant development, given the sensitive status of this species, and one that will be discussed more fully in the next issue of Bird Observer. A "Portlandica" Arctic Tern that made a protracted and very surprising visit to the Connecticut River in the latter half of June was well documented with photographs, and in mid-May a Forster's Tern was seen, albeit fleetingly, in Newburyport, the only locality in New England where this species has been found breeding.

A Common Murre found lingering in Wellfleet in May might have been ill or injured. Four breeding-plumage Black Guillemots at Cape Ann in June fueled the faint hope that this species might have been nesting locally, while the presence of two Atlantic Puffins seen at the same locale, the same day was remarkable and inexplicable.

Because of their aversion for crossing broad bodies of water, Great Horned Owls are seldom seen on coastal islands, so a pair on Nashawena was noteworthy. Short-eared Owls nesting at Tuckernuck were found in lower numbers than in the previous year; two Short-eareds at Nantucket provided no firm evidence that they were breeding on that island, the only other known nesting locality in New England. A minimum of sixteen Northern Saw-whet Owls tallied by a single observer (listener) during a spring survey within several towns in Berkshire County provided a glimmer of insight into the status of a species whose true abundance, like that of many nocturnal species, remains largely a matter of conjecture.

Away from Martha's Vineyard, where the species has been suspected of breeding for years, Chuck-will's-widow is still a rare visitor, though spring reports on Cape Cod have become more or less annual. This spring a Chuck was also noted far inland, in Montague. Despite apparent declines elsewhere, healthy numbers of Whip-poor-wills were found for the second consecutive year in Lancaster. The remarkable Rufous Hummingbird that has now spent several consecutive winters in a greenhouse in Northhampton was released again in early May.

Noteworthy woodpecker reports included a single Red-headed Woodpecker in Hanson and above-average counts of Red-bellied Woodpecker (in Medford) and Pileated Woodpecker (at Oxbow NWR).

FLYCATCHERS THROUGH GROSBEAKS

A good number of Olive-sided Flycatchers were reported, with four reported before May 15, a decidedly early arrival for this species, which typically does not show up until the third week of the month. This species has been reported to breed very sporadically in Berkshire County, but none of the dates of these reports are suggestive of breeding. Acadian Flycatchers are uncommon and very local breeders, with most known nesting locales in the central and western part of the state. It is therefore intriguing to get reports of two males singing in Chilmark on Martha's Vineyard, where there has been circumstantial evidence of breeding in recent years, well into June, and another individual on Tuckernuck Island, near Nantucket, on June 23. Two Scissor-tailed Flycatchers were discovered on May 31, one on Nantucket and the second at Turner's Falls Airport in Montague. This species is rare enough in the state, but inland occurrences are especially infrequent.

A count of 14 Yellow-throated Vireos at South Quabbin Reservoir was an unusually high number, even for a known breeding location. A Philadelphia Vireo at Oxbow National Wildlife Refuge in Harvard was singing on territory throughout June, for the third year in a row. There is no breeding record for this species in the state, and there was no proof of this individual breeding. However, this sighting was particularly intriguing, because it was seen (and recorded) singing both Philadelphia and Warbling vireo songs. The Warbling Vireo song was not "perfect," but, according to the observer, "was close enough that one would think they were listening to a WAVI with a bit of an odd song. Since the bird was singing such an odd song I did scrutinize it more than usual and I can say unequivocally that it was a typical PHVI in all respects." While Philadelphia Vireo is most closely related to Warbling Vireo, there are no known cases of hybridization between these species.

A Fish Crow at Oaks Bluff may be a first record for Martha's Vineyard. A pair of Common Ravens nesting in Ashland produced two young — the southeastern-most confirmed breeding record in Massachusetts.

Purple Martins are rarely reported away from the coast; an individual in Petersham on May 29 is only the second report west of Worcester county since 1992.

Winter Wrens were reported in excellent numbers throughout the region, with counts of 12 in Hingham and Norwell being particularly impressive. Sedge Wren is extremely uncommon during spring migration, so an individual discovered in Provincetown by a Birdathon team on May 15 was a fine discovery. Golden-crowned Kinglets are known to breed in the mountains of Berkshire and Worcester counties, but breeding in the eastern part of the state is extremely uncommon. Since this species has generally cleared out of non-breeding territory by mid-May, individuals seen on May 15 in Sharon and Lakeville are interesting.

Since the division of Gray-cheeked Thrush into Gray-cheeked and Bicknell's, it has been problematic reporting these two species. Many contributors continue to refer to the species pair as simply "Gray-cheeked." Differentiating between the two species in the field is extremely difficult, so in the interest of conservative reporting, all reports of "Gray-cheeked" are classified as "Gray-cheeked/Bicknell's" unless accompanied by a description of why a specific identification was made. The Swainson's Thrush migration was mediocre for the second year in a row. The report of an individual on Mount Greylock on June 19 was suggestive of breeding.

Only four Golden-winged Warblers were reported during the period, and none during June, when they could be assumed to be breeding. By contrast, there were eight reports of "Brewster's" and "Lawrence's," the Blue-winged/Golden-winged hybrids. The future of the Golden-winged Warbler in Massachusetts does not look promising.

Warbler migration in general was lackluster. Various species showed up at roughly the right time, but in atypically poor numbers. A Townsend's Warbler in Provincetown on May 10 was a true highlight. The last spring Townsend's reported in Massachusetts was on May 7, 1997, in the same location.

Blackpoll Warblers are among the latest of the spring migrants, with a typical arrival date in the middle of May, but there were several reports quite early in the month. Mourning Warblers pass through even later, usually not arriving until the last week in May, yet there were also a handful of early reports of this species as well. The later June reports of both of these species in the western part of the state were presumably breeders.

"Good" warblers were well reported: two Yellow-throated, two Prothonotary, three to four Kentucky, and a surprising eight Hooded warblers. A Yellow-breasted Chat loitered into the end of June in Westboro. This species has bred in Massachusetts, and this report is certainly suggestive.

Seven reports of Summer Tanager was an unusually high number for this occasional southern visitor. A single Western Tanager was exceptionally unusual for spring.

An "Ipswich" Savannah Sparrow on May 21 in Gloucester was late. Dark-eyed Juncos reported during the period were from breeding areas in the western part of the state. The only Dickcissel reported was an individual in Belchertown May 21-22.

American Goldfinches are often perceived to be non-migratory, however annual migration counts on Plum Island are showing that large diurnal flights of goldfinches are not uncommon. M.W.R.

* Indicates a species on the review list of the Massachusetts Avian Records Committee (MARC). Because these sightings are generally published before the MARC votes, they normally have not been approved by the MARC. The editors publish records that are supported by details, multiple observers, or both.
