PREPARATION OF MANUSCRIPT

To CONDOR Contributors:

The building of a journal begins with the preparation of the copy by the author. This phase may be so managed that it will contribute to accuracy of workmanship, dispatch in handling, and economy of production. Cooperation of author with editor, publisher and printer results in benefit to all four: the author secures creditable presentation of his ideas, the editor is relieved of needless drudgery, the publisher obtains the highest quality and best service for the money expended, and the printer profits through the economy of time, effort and materials.

As regards the author, an important feature of his cooperation is to see, himself, that his manuscript is as nearly as possible ready for delivery to the printer.

The CONDOR is published by the Cooper Ornithological Club, and practically all the Club's money goes into the magazine; no editor and no business manager receives any pay other than the satisfaction of doing a service worthily. Articles published in the CONDOR are written by Club members. Poor copy for the printer results in poor proof, requiring repeated resetting of type and eye-straining re-reading of proof. Resetting type costs money. Money saved by good management may be expended toward a larger and better magazine. As an aid toward such economy the following rules and recommendations have been drawn up. They apply to advertising matter and "Minutes", as well as to articles.

RULES

1. Manuscripts should be typewritten; if this is not possible, they must be in perfectly clear handwriting.
2. Use one side of the paper only. No circumstances allow of an exception to this rule. 8½ x 11 inch size is standard; 11 inches high is the limit.
3. In typewritten manuscript always leave double space between the lines. This applies to all kinds of matter. In handwritten copy leave as much space as is occupied by the written line itself. Do not underline anything except what is to be printed in italics.
4. Liberal margins should be left at the top and sides of each sheet; fully 1½ inches at the left side.
5. Foot-notes are not employed in the CONDOR; citations to previous literature are to be entered in the text.
6. The author should himself prepare copy for titles, and, where needed, for subtitles.
7. The author should himself prepare full and illuminating legends for illustrations.

RECOMMENDATIONS

It may be assumed that the author has used due care in arranging his material, in determining logical sequence of presentation, and in ensuring conciseness and clearness of each statement. But before the manuscript is submitted it would be well to give it thorough revision as a whole. The excision of superfluous words and phrases, and of immaterial detail generally, will not only make for clearness and precision, but will also reduce the cost of publication appreciably. Conciseness is particularly to be recommended in papers on technical subjects.

Observe CONDOR style and usage, and prepare your paper accordingly. "General articles" and the brief "Field and Study" items are printed in different styles.

There are manuals published that give detailed instruction for the preparation of manuscript. Those who care to provide themselves with such aids, and will study them, will find their output improved. Two such standard publications are the Manual of Style, issued by the University of Chicago Press, and the Rules of the Editorial Committee, issued by the University of California Press.
